PROJECT DIRECTOR • FACILITATOR

"Our education and processes promote quantum growth in the people of the world, helping them transform their lives and thus their ability to help others do the same."

—Deborah O. Louise

Deborah Louise is a senior project director and leadership coach with The Pacific Institute. She first became involved with the Institute as a client in a large Federal Government agency. Because of her passion to share this education with others, she made a career change in 1995 and joined The Pacific Institute.

As a result of her 25 years as a top-level administrator in the Federal Government, Deborah has an insider's knowledge of the challenges facing Government leaders and their staffs today. She also has an advanced understanding of the technology of change, including automated systems, personal computing, systems management and total quality processes.

Most importantly, perhaps, she knows how to help people fit comfortably into the equation of new technology and increasingly rapid change. "Rapid change has become a permanent part of our world. Our ability to adapt and to think in ways that facilitate change are critical factors as, together, we invent the future."

Several years before she left her work with the Federal Government, Deborah became an outspoken champion of The Pacific Institute's programs and processes. Already skilled and experienced as a seminar leader and presenter, she is a facilitator instructor and project director for The Pacific Institute, and certified as an expert in its educational and businessimprovement processes.

In addition to Federal/Military, state and local Government agencies, Deborah works successfully with many other clients, including educators, youth development organizations, and a wide variety of businesses. Regardless of the setting, as a leadership coach, her focus is the same: to help her clients set and achieve new standards of excellence, and to give them the tools that allow them to take charge of personal, business and culture change.
