

Steve P A P P A J O H N

PROJECT DIRECTOR • FACILITATOR

From an early age, the fields of science and education captivated Steve Pappajohn. Trained as a high school science teacher, and later as an exploration geologist, the pursuit of this passion resulted in a 25-year career as a consultant in the energy industry. As a certified energy industry professional, with broad project development experience in emerging resource technology, Steve has participated in dozens of pioneering exploration and research projects. This training and background allows him to relate the tenets of traditional scientific investigation to the application of cognitive psychology for those exploring ways to develop more of their personal and organizational resources.

Through The Pacific Institute's science-based curriculum, Steve has gained insight into the significant degree that professionals in science-based industries can expand their value-generating capability for both their stakeholders and their greater communities in general. Using his background and the Institute's Root Cause Analysis approach, Steve focuses on helping to create integrated solutions that impact individuals, corporations, and communities. He believes that by providing this science-based education to science-driven knowledge professionals, quantum advancements in the quality of life are possible.

"In an increasingly global setting, it is vitally important that professionals – their families, organizations, and communities – function at optimum effectiveness. We have an enormous and unique opportunity, through The Pacific Institute's education, to leverage the collective innovative, creative and productive capabilities of our networked society into the happiness and success of generations in the U.S. and around the globe."

Steve and his wife, Jackie, have two children and make their home in Maple Valley, Washington.
